Remembrall

For the things you meant to keep.

A place to drop the words, recipes, books, reels and facts you find interesting, and a glass orb that hands a few of them back to you every day.

A word in a Poe story

Reading Edgar Allan Poe's Metzengerstein, I kept stopping at words I liked. Words like inveterate. I'd look them up, love them for a minute, and lose them by the next week.

Remembrall started as a way to keep those words around, and grew to hold everything else I find interesting and then forget.

WORD OF THE DAY

Inveterate

in·vet·er·ate adjective

Having a habit or way of being so long that it is unlikely to change. An inveterate reader; an inveterate liar.

THE PROBLEM

Saved is not the same as remembered

We save things all day, and almost never look at them again. They sink under everything newer.

REELS

The recipe reel saved at midnight

RECIPES

Steak sinuglaw, tiramisu chia seeds

NOTES

Ideas typed into a notes app, then buried

WORDS

Inveterate, from a Poe story

BOOKS

The one you said you'd read next

FACTS

Something wonderful from a video

Drop it in. It comes back. Tick it off.

Drop it in

Type the thing, pick a shelf, and add a line to jog your memory. Paste a link and it becomes tappable.

It comes back

Every day, at the hour you choose, Remembrall sends a notification with up to three things, each from a different shelf.

Tick it off

Made the recipe? Read the book? Tick it as done and it leaves your reminders. Untick to bring it back.

The smoke turns red

Like the Remembrall in Harry Potter, the orb fills with red smoke when there is something you've forgotten. Tap it and today's recall clears into view.

The same list arrives as a notification on your phone or computer, at the hour you pick, in your own time zone.

A shelf for every kind of thing

Six shelves to start, and you can add your own. Tap a shelf to see what's on it, then tap an entry to open its memory line and links.
